Nothing in this Guide constitutes any guarantee or endorsement from CanREA of any particular installer, manufacturer or supplier listed herein. As always, like with any industry and any purchase, due diligence and research is required to determine what terms, conditions and warranties may or may not be available to you if developing a project, buying a system from any company, or allowing a system to be installed on your roof or your property. CanREA recommends you conduct your own due diligence and seek professional advice, opinions and recommendations before purchasing any equipment, hiring any installer, contracting with any company, or signing any contract with respect to solar energy production, hosting, or sale.

CanREA does not warrant or make any representations concerning the accuracy, likely results or reliability of the use of the materials, or otherwise relating to such materials on our website or on any sites linked to from CanREA's website. CanREA assumes no liability or responsibility for any errors or omissions in the content of this material and alerts you that information, pricing, programs, laws and policies can and will change over time.

The solar power production industry in Canada, particularly at the residential and small business level, is in a steady state of evolution and development, and all interested homeowners and property owners should familiarize themselves with current programs, offerings, pricing, financing, credits and/or rebates available in their local area. All information should be checked at each applicable time against official sources and applicable law before being relied on for commercial purposes. It is your responsibility to ensure that any project, system, or installation you participate in complies with applicable law and regulatory requirements in your jurisdiction.
